

58%

of IKEA's first-time buyers in India never return

The real problem isn't price. It's experience.

SWIPE TO SEE WHY →

Three signals. One root cause.

24%

YoY rise in support tickets

assembly issues,
missing parts, delivery
delays

Never formally analyzed

exit surveys flagging “too far, too overwhelming, too effortful”

No shared metric

digital tracks sessions, stores track footfall —
separately

Meanwhile, competitors are capturing the customers IKEA lets go.

Interviewing only happy customers is a research trap.

5-star reviewers

Not where the answer is Silent churners & critics

Where the real signal lives

The proposed plan only talked to customers who left positive reviews — the group least likely to explain why 58% never come back.

Fix the experience before you fix the price.

Pricing campaigns come after, not first.

Growth without fixing the experience just refills a leaky funnel.

This is what happens when you separate the real opportunity from the obvious symptom before proposing a fix.

Would you have prioritized experience over price?